What is the retail sector?

The retail sector is a huge part of the New Zealand economy, and a bellwether of economic performance. A thriving retail sector is key to a thriving community and social well-being. Retail businesses create places for social interaction, offer jobs to New Zealanders, and provide the goods and services that Kiwis need to run their lives.

Retail is large employer, with 9.6% of all New Zealand's filled jobs in the sector, but the biggest firms account for the majority of employment. Nearly half of New Zealand's 27,759 retail businesses are owner-operators and employ no staff, while 345 large retail businesses employ over half of the retail employees across the nation.

Retail spending has grown slowly over the last decade and as of June 2019 accounted for over $96.8 billion. However, retailers are now beginning to feel greater pressure. This is true particularly for more discretionary spending categories, where consumers are choosing to spend less. Additionally, retailers across the entire sector are feeling a squeeze due to continuously increasing operational costs, pressure on wages and the cost of payments all while trying to keep up with innovative technology and delivering an exceptional customer experience.

Retail NZ and The Register are here to help New Zealand Retailers succeed and thrive

The average person spends $22,273 per year in retail

If you want to talk shop The Register is the place to do it. Replacing NZ Retail, The Register is a trade publication aimed at retailers and their staff.

After more than 60 years of speaking to the industry through their magazine, Retail NZ launched The Register in 2015 extending the same great Industry reporting into the 21st Century.

THE REGISTER
